Who Is Lisandra?

Lisandra Vazquez, a Puerto Rican-American comedian who has spent significant time in Los Angeles and Atlanta, brings unique cultural perspectives to her videos and performances. Her humor effectively plays on both international and domestic topics, with a recent shift toward ever-evolving, timely political content.

Although her current audience doesn't reflect it, this shift lends an opportunity for more young fans to connect with her content. Her strong social media presence is a huge strength, as people are turning to social media now more than ever before for news on current events. Comedy is becoming the new channel of news for a surprising number of people.

- Total Followers = 1.7 million (all platforms)
 - @lisandravcomedy on most

She has been capitalizing on current US and world news events through her comedy, and has seen an engagement jump because of it.

Who's Watching - Audience Demographics

Lisandra has a complex audience. While ethnicity and political affiliation data are not directly available, Lisandra's content (PR cultural identity, immigration commentary, and left-leaning political satire) strongly suggests a disproportionately Latino audience, accompanied by a broader politically progressive core across ethnicities. This is supported by the language and sentiment of her supporters' comments, which point to an engaged, politically active audience.

The more significant data lies in the age demographic, as Lisandra has an older demographic than her content and follower counts across media might suggest.

Audience Demographics (cont.) + Insights

Her current audience is 63% female, and nearly 60% of them fall between the ages of 35 and 54 and skew older rather than younger (via Beacons). This is not a weakness. Older progressive audiences tend to be loyal, highly engaged through likes, comments, and shares. They also carry far more disposable income than younger viewers. They are daily consumers who pay to support creators they identify with and believe in (as evidenced by supporter comments).

The Gen Z and Millennial audience represents Lisandra's growth opportunity, while the 35+ female base is her foundation. Shows/tours should cater to these individuals.

Where Her Audience Is

Lisandra's audience is very spread out across the US, but due to her audience's loyalty, they are likely willing to travel to see and support her on tour. That being said, some cities stand out (via Beacons audience data):

- Data-backed cities:
- SF/Bay Area/NorCal - the largest audience segment is CA Other (meaning other than LA), and is confirmed by paying supporter comments
- Chicago & Houston - follow demographic prediction: both have large Latino communities and progressive audiences, top cities on Beacons
- LA - another massive Latino audience, and a history of being a strong comedy hub in the US

General CA tour is viable, as she has documented traction across the state, could add San Diego and/or Sacramento, based on what the data is showing us

Where Her Audience Is

Projected cities to add based on available data + inferences:

- Atlanta - she already has traction, success, and notoriety, very viable location
- NYC - Puerto Rican diaspora capital of the US. A huge population of progressive, politically active individuals
- Orlando - home to the largest Puerto Rican community in the US outside of NY
- Philadelphia - another strong PR community, tends to lean left politically, aligning with Lisandra's content
- Austin - most progressive pocket in Texas, with a young audience, could complement Houston
- Miami - large Latino audience, even without the Cuban focus

Note: Great Britain Other is her second strongest segment, meaning she has international reach with people consuming American politics from the outside.

The Viewer Profile

The average Lisandra viewer/consumer is a progressive woman. She is 35+, and found Lisandra's content through a share from a friend or an algorithm rabbit hole during an exhausting national news cycle, where she decided to check social media for relief from mainstream media, but she never left. She is college-educated, politically engaged, and has determined the best way to process the current political climate is through comedy. Lisandra helps her laugh at news that otherwise feels absurd and overwhelming. She regularly shares content, leaves comments, and is the type of fan who will buy a ticket to a show and ask her friends to join her.

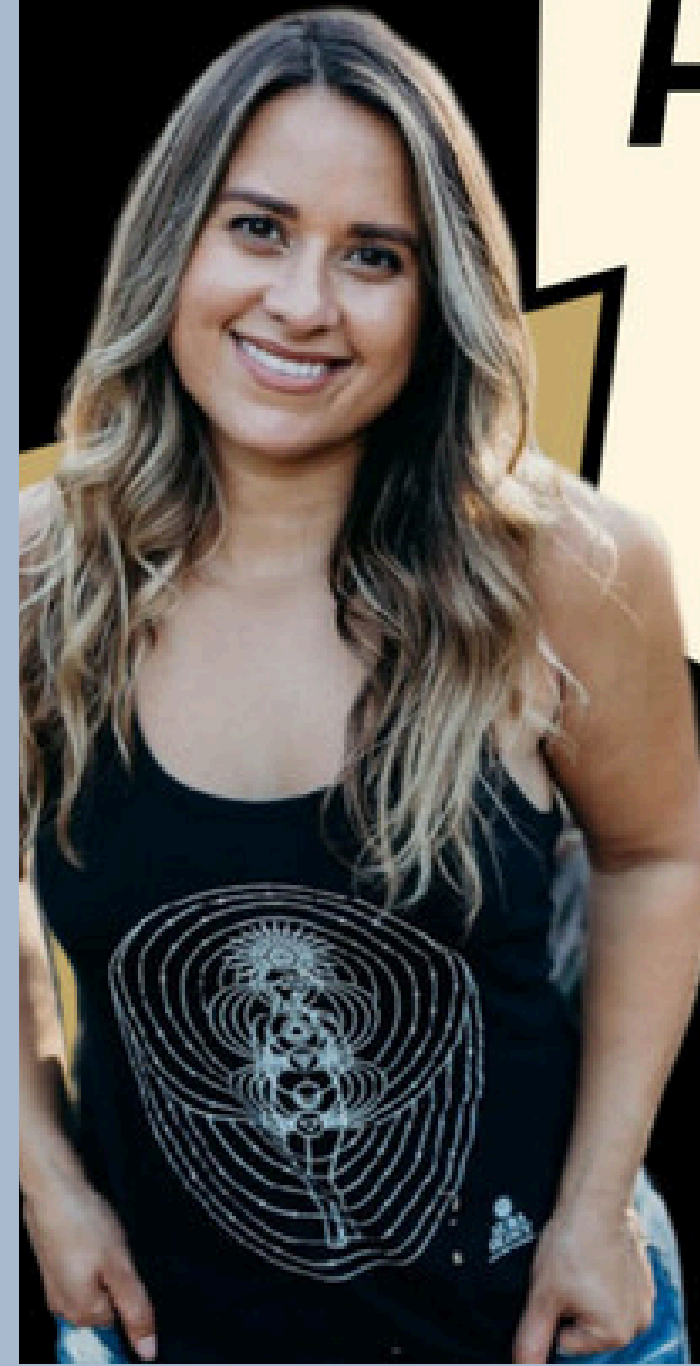

Her alternative is a Gen Z or younger Millennial who discovered Lisandra through TikTok. She represents a growth opportunity in the audience. She is more likely to be Latina and have a personal connection to the cultural identity of Lisandra's content. She is the future of Lisandra's audience and represents a bridge to broader mainstream impact.

Brand Affinity

Lisandra's base of progressive women with disposable income + a growing younger Latina audience makes her an attractive partner for brands who want access to both demographics. The key here is authenticity: this audience is skeptical of performative brand alignment and will disengage at any sign of a disingenuous partnership that feels purely transactional. Brands that make sense include:

- Media/Streaming platforms - any large platform, or platforms investing in Latino comedy content. Her general audience is already a streaming audience, so this is viable.
- Latino-owned/founded consumer brands - food/beverage, beauty, and wellness brands with genuine roots rather than performative Latino marketing. Her audience must perceive the brands as truly belonging in the same world as her content.
- News and media brands - podcasting/independent media platforms, newsletters, and journalism products. Her audience consumes news through comedy and is therefore likely to identify with brands that exist as an adjacent informational space

A few other brand affinity opportunities exist. However, these are a bit higher risk, and would have to walk a tighter rope to avoid her audience perceiving her as ‘selling out’ for profit.

Opportunities include:

- Women’s health and wellness - the 35+ demographic is a primary target for this category, but a partnership with a brand that pushes a miracle cure runs the risk of being perceived as putting profit over people and therefore distancing Lisandra from her core audience. An ideal brand would promote active participation in wellness, such as fitness or physical activity of some sort, rather than a product that claims to solve problems by simply purchasing it.
- Progressive lifestyle brands - socially conscious companies with an established progressive identity are less risky. These could be brands that have taken public stances on the issues that Lisandra covers in her content. Her audience trusts her political opinion and should extend that trust to brands she aligns with.

Why Now?

Political comedy has always existed, but recently it has exploded and is now more consumed than it ever has been. The public's trust in traditional media is at a historic low, and news fatigue is something we've all experienced to some extent. Comedians like Lisandra, who can translate the chaos into digestible and even enjoyable comedy, are filling a space that has been vacated by traditional journalists and news commentators.

Lisandra sits at the intersection of several current forces and needs. With the rise of political and social pressure on the Latino community and the demand for authentic progressive content creators at an all-time high, she represents more than just a comedian. Her supporters' comments are not just compliments. They are signals that people are depending on her to help them get through the week. The timing for live shows and brand partnerships is now. Her audience is primed to show up, spend money in support, and tell their friends about Lisandra. The infrastructure for her moment is already in place, the question is whether the right partners will move quickly enough to be a part of it.
