Touring Cities

1. Necessary Cities

1. LA – dominant market, #1 on Chartmetric by far (25.9%)
2. Chicago – 13.7% of estimated overall audience, culturally aligned with indie and R&B sides of TNL
3. NYC – when combined with Brooklyn, higher listener share than Chicago, + the recency bias of TNL's viral IG post, must-have

2. Confirmed, Strong Cities

1. Denver – 6.3% and keeps showing up across BASH's roster, meaning it is a real market for their artists' sound
2. Dallas – confirmed in data, effective anchor for a Texas run, songs like 'Needa Bih' do extremely well here
3. Houston – natural pairing with Dallas
4. Seattle – known indie audience that discovers music exactly how we expect TNL's followers to

3. Cities Supported by Data and Trends

1. Atlanta – confirmed in data, consistent across the roster, and R&B sound of TNL performs well there
2. Philadelphia – confirmed, strong indie scene, and a large youth audience. Predicted market across past BASH analyses, now showing up in hard data
3. Charlotte – Chartmetric confirmed, most surprising pick with a growing young scene, and doesn't show up for most artists at this level meaning it is worth capitalizing on now, notably J. Cole territory for future comps
4. Phoenix – young demographic and tends to mirror Australian markets' listening patterns

Top 3 Songs & Significance

Feel The Music

Spotify Streams: 568.7K

Artist Comp: Dominic Fike

Their most streamed track that most effectively reflects TNL's identity. It's warm, danceable indie R&B that makes you want to nod your head and learn the hook to be able to sing along. It hits the algorithm the same way Dominic Fike's early catalog did.

Needa Bih (OMG)

Spotify Streams: 450K

Artist Comp: Larry June

Sha Crow's verses take the lead, with Benny singing a melodic hook to bring it all together. It displays a laid back West Coast energy, and it effectively bridges the gap between the duo's two different yet compatible sonic worlds.

Rock The DJ

Spotify Streams: 184K

Artist Comp: Steve Lacy

This song has the most funk in TNL's catalog, leaning more on the GarageBand indie sound that allowed Steve Lacy to go viral. Its short guitar chords, catchy and singable hook, and its beautiful simplicity come off as down-to-earth while remaining very listenable.

Street Performances = Streaming Spike?

March 3rd, 2025

TNL posted a video of one of their street performances. It features a shirtless Sha Crow and Benny Bellson on the corner of Beverly Blvd and N Stanley Ave in Los Angeles. The caption reads as if the video is recorded by an outsider rather than being recorded for and posted by TNL, with the caption “these guys giving a Coachella-level performance for $0 on a random street corner.” It starts with a little bit of comedy, with Sha telling the crowd to “bring a shawty,” and Benny telling him that it’s a good idea and that he “might get a kiss because the show is so good.” They perform ‘Just Don’t Hold It Back’ passionately, with Sha hanging from the pole with the street signs, and Benny crouching in the street, while the crowd nods along to the music.

The Effect Following the Instagram Post

This video has over 71k likes, compared to TNL’s 13.7k followers on Instagram, making it an effectively viral post. TNL’s streaming numbers saw a massive jump in early March (Chartmetric), especially in NYC, likely due to this post. The framing of the video allowed for an organic discovery narrative on social media that resonates with the algorithm, and it obviously picked up with a community or demographic in New York. It doesn’t feel like a promotional post, but rather a genuine moment that people stumbled on while scrolling Instagram, and it made them want to check out TNL, leading them to search them up, listen, and start streaming their music.

We can extrapolate valuable information from this moment. One of TNL’s greatest strength is their live performance. That kind of organic content creation can be used to grow a base, as well as to sell tickets for a tour. It also means that NYC is now a must-have for any future TNL tours, and the recency bias is still strong, so to capitalize on it sooner would be better.

TNL's Listener Demographics

The Numbers

No ethnicity demographics were available, but the age demographics are telling. Their audience is about 60% female and 40% male, likely due to the majority of their songs skewing towards indie R&B rather than rap, but the dual identity of the group is a strength. Benny's indie-leaning tracks generally pull the female audience in while Sha Crow's rap-forward tracks bring in more male listeners.

The largest age group is the 25–34 year olds at 46.3% across genders, with females under 25 making up about 30% of their audience. These demographics suggest that their listeners are young professionals, college seniors/recent graduates, and people in their late 20s who found TNL organically.

The Average Listener

A 25–34 year old discovers a small duo called TNL through a video on social media or through suggested music on their preferred streaming platform. They keep listening because the music sits in a sweet spot between feel-good and high-energy. The indie foundations feel real rather than pretentious and manufactured. The listener sees there is a TNL concert in a city near them, and buys a ticket, not knowing exactly what to expect. They show up and feel instantly welcomed. When the music plays, whether they are there for the indie or for the rap, they can enjoy the music and the energy rather than feeling isolated by the music feeling commercial and one-sided.

What This Means

Compared to the rest of the BASH roster, TNL's gender balance is a huge advantage, both in marketing and performances. They can play venues that skew either direction without isolating half of the audience. This makes venue selection and touring in general more flexible than an artist with a 75% male or female base.

The large segment of 25–34 year olds is important. This audience has disposable income, as well as a motivation to actually buy tickets, go to shows, and bring friends, rather than streaming from the comfort of their home. They want to make memories while enjoying the music, not just consume it digitally.

Brand Affinity

Live Event Brands

The corner concert video that went viral is important here, as it showcases TNL's live energy as a huge asset.

They're raw, authentic, and magnetic. Brands centered around live experiences, such as music festivals or live streaming platforms could partner with TNL, hoping to appear culturally plugged in rather than simply buying into a desired market.

Alcohol and Beverage

The concentration of 25-34 year olds with disposable income is a target demographic for casual beverage brands that market towards social experiences. Brands such as Pacifico or Modelo, High Noon, or even Celsius would appear to be naturally aligned with TNL's sound and documented audience profile.

Streetwear & Fashion

The 60/40 gender split makes TNL attractive to brands that want to reach both young men and women without alienating either. These could range from Carhartt to New Balance, and could include emerging brands that want to reach a young base through genuine artist partnerships rather than forced celebrity brand deals.
